Connection, trusting relationships, two-way intimate communication -- adding up moment by moment, building healthy brains for life!
Family and Home Network focuses on children's needs for warm, nurturing relationships with their parents -- and on parents' experiences and feelings as they take the time to meet their children's needs.

Have you heard that many of our nation's most renowned developmental scientists are gravely concerned because so many babies and young children are not getting the nurturing care they need?
All parents need accurate information about the needs of their babies and the significance of their time together. Parents need support -- from extended family and friends and also from public policies.

We've been busy spreading the word about our Campaign for Inclusive Family Policies -- we call for policies for ALL families.

The ways in which families meet their income-earning and caregiving responsibilities should not determine their eligibility for support and services.

Campaign for Inclusive Family Policies

We've sent over one hundred press releases out to potential allies and media representatives about the Campaign for Inclusive Family Policies and we've been busy having follow-up conversations and forging alliances. We also sent press releases to every Presidential candidate and we continue to analyze family policy proposals and speak with legislative staff members.

Did you see the New York Times article "At-Home Parents Work Hard. Should They Be Paid?" by Claire Cain
SOME families want full-time child care BUT others prefer care by at-home mother or father by tag-team parents (working different hours) by grandparents or other family members by any number of other caregiving choices (often used part-time) - some examples: preschool, babysitting co-op, nanny share, family day care, night-time care to accommodate parents' employment schedules.

Miller (October 3, 2019)? In addition to posting an online comment, we sent a letter to the New York Times. Please read Catherine Myers' blog post about our advocacy in response to this article and let us know what you think.
